

THE CALIFORNIA CHILDREN'S TRUST

A planning process designed to reimagine the way we define, serve, and invest in the social, emotional, developmental, and behavioral health of California's children and their families.

The California Children's Trust is an initiative to leverage the power of behavioral health supports and strategies—and the resources behind them—to achieve healthy development and health equity for children in California.

The initiative seeks to reinvent our state's approach to children's social, emotional, and developmental health using consensus building and systems change approaches. Its success depends upon families, system leaders, advocates, and professionals uniting to reimagine behavioral health as a foundational strategy for achieving healthy development and health equity for children in California.

We can do better. For the first time in our state's history, almost all children (97%) are covered by health insurance with a behavioral health benefit—a benefit that could be applied across all child-serving systems. Yet the majority of children do not access this benefit, resulting in significant unmet need.

Measured against developmental benchmarks, epidemiological estimates, or access to quality care, California's child-serving systems are failing. Services vary dramatically by geography and setting, with little consistency or accountability. Many child-serving systems struggle to meet requirements codified in state and federal law.

By redefining the scope and nature of behavioral health—and the procurement, financing, and delivery systems behind it—we can nurture children's social, emotional, and developmental health from birth through young adulthood and engage and support their families in the process. The CA Children's Trust is a collaborative initiative to capture unique opportunities—right now—to conceive, fund, administer, measure, and deliver a comprehensive system of support for all children.

Many children are exposed to trauma and have behavioral health needs, yet most children in California who need support do not receive it:

Of California's children who report needing help for emotional or behavioral health problems, only 35% receive mental health services.

Between 20 and 25% of youth meet criteria for a mental health disorder with severe impairment across their lifetime.

Approximately 50% of California children are enrolled in Medi-Cal and entitled to behavioral health services under the Early and Periodic Screening, Diagnostic and Treatment (EPSDT) Medicaid benefit. Yet annually, less than 5% of eligible children access EPSDT behavioral health services.

Youth of color disproportionately receive punitive and restrictive behavioral interventions in response to signs of trauma and emotional stress caused by structural racism, and other systemic, social, economic, and environmental factors.

California is 43rd in the nation in providing the behavioral, developmental, and social screenings key to identifying early signs of challenges.

Why now?

A confluence of factors provides significant opportunity:

- Clear evidence demonstrates the importance of behavioral health to healthy development and social and emotional learning—particularly for children exposed to trauma or other adverse childhood experiences.
- Promising trauma-informed practices address health equity and support the transformation of child-serving systems.
- The children’s mental health benefit under Medicaid is an uncapped entitlement (EPSDT) with a broad definition of medical necessity that can be reinterpreted to expand services and supports.
- $2.5 billion of unspent county and state mental health funds are eligible for federal match. These resources create an opportunity to generate significant new federal revenue.
- Federal Medicaid waivers must be renegotiated by 2020, providing an opportunity to redefine federal, state, and county roles and responsibilities under new state leadership.
- Models of collaborative administration and creative financing in other states offer strategies that can be applied to California’s fragmented child-serving systems.

By expanding our definition of behavioral health and changing how we finance and administer it, we can meet the developmental needs of all children, improve health outcomes, reduce stigma, address inequity, and reinvent California’s child-serving systems.

Please join us in this initiative to improve the health and well-being of California’s children.

For more information or to learn how you can get involved, please contact Alex Briscoe at alex@cachildrenstrust.org

Partners who have made early commitments to the initiative include:

Breaking Barriers

Children Now

First 5 Association

Futures Without Violence

East Bay Agency for Children

Genentech Corporate Giving

Lincoln

McKenzie Foundation of San Francisco

Mental Health Services Oversight and Accountability Commission (MHSOAC)

National Health Law Program (NHeLP)

Seneca Family of Agencies

Stanford University Center for Youth Mental Health and Well-being

Social Policy Institute at San Diego State University School of Social Work

The Children’s Partnership

Trauma Transformed

University of California, Los Angeles

University of California San Francisco (UCSF) Benioff Children’s Hospital Oakland

WestCoast Children’s Center

West Ed

Zellerbach Family Foundation

THE CALIFORNIA CHILDREN'S TRUST

Theory of Change

